The book has two parts: Chapters 2–6 focus on the theoretical aspects of DST and its application to language and language development; Chapters Bad Language: Are Some Words Better than Others? report the findings of three empirical studies on language and aging in multilingual contexts. The initial assumption that immigrants would one day return home meant that the cost of any teaching of immigrant languages has usually fallen on the countries of origin. The example of the Ebonics controversy allows Battistella to show how, even within one speech community, there may be conflicting attitudes towards the variation at its disposal, and we also see how fraught with difficulty was the dialogue between linguists and educational policy makers on the one hand, and the general public on the other, with the media often distorting and simplifying the arguments.
